The Independent Observer releases this Volume I, Foundational Manifesto, as a model for critical thinking and philosophical reflection on political events, history, economics, and societal issues.

Abstract.

This working paper, published under The Independent Observer, examines the intersections of philosophy, politics, economics, and history through a critical studies framework. Drawing upon both U.S. and global contexts, it analyzes the structural contradictions within democratic systems, the persistence of economic inequality, and the transformation of political authority in the modern era. The paper blends historical analysis with contemporary critique, highlighting how law, labor, and media shape power relations and influence public perception. While rooted in academic research, the paper also examines how narrative and speculative frameworks, including science fiction, serve as tools for political commentary and social critique. By integrating multiple disciplines, this work aims to provide readers with both theoretical insight and practical reflection on the realities of governance, social movements, and systemic control. The Independent Observer project seeks to foster dialogue that transcends partisan boundaries, promoting critical thinking and civic literacy. The intended audience includes scholars, activists, independent researchers, and members of the public seeking to understand how political and economic systems have been sustained, challenged, or reimagined throughout history and into the present.

Introduction: Purpose of the Independent Observer

The Independent Observer supports activists, whistleblowers, and researchers documenting history, politics, and economics. It features articles cited by the author, who seeks to understand the development of society. Inspired by investigative journalism, legal self-representation, and decentralized media, it is formatted for Creative Commons licensing and online indexing. Combined with evidence, policy citations, or expert commentary, it serves as a research tool for platforms like SSRN or ResearchGate. Not suitable for individuals who are easily offended or emotionally sensitive, as it covers contentious topics with references. It includes footers, timestamps, and licensing details, acting as a visual and record-keeping tool.

Introduction to Foundational Manifesto

In a world increasingly filled with noise, division, and carefully crafted falsehoods, The Independent Observer is dedicated to one goal: to provide honest dialogue to authority figures—and to reveal the systems that have turned democracy into a spectacle and justice into just a loophole.

This channel was not created for celebrity recognition, political purposes, or sensationalist stories. It stems from frustration and dissatisfaction with a society that values wealth more than hard work, perception over true principles, and loyalty over critical thinking. It was started by someone raised on the fringes who experienced the American Dream firsthand, only to realize that it had been altered to exclude those without inherited wealth or institutional ties.

My name is Sid Wardhan, and I established this channel to challenge the legal, economic, and political systems that perpetuate the situation where millions live paycheck to paycheck, while billionaires dictate the rules. I am not aligned with either the left or the right. I have no interest in theatricality. My focus is on reality—the everyday experiences faced by working-class individuals of all races and backgrounds, which are seldom reflected in policy discussions or headlines.

The Independent Observer endeavors to scrutinize the legal judgments that facilitated modern manifestations of slavery extending beyond 1865. It aims to analyze the persistence of Terry v. Ohio (392 U.S. 1 (1968)) as a binding statute, the replacement of plantation systems by mass incarceration, and the limited influence exerted by historically marginalized groups that contributed to the nation's founding over its future. This platform is dedicated to exploring and critically evaluating the aspects of the American justice system, taxation policies, foreign labor exploitation, and bipartisan inadequacies.

This channel is created to give people what has been systematically taken away from them: knowledge, perspective, strategy, and a vision for change. I do not just criticize; I build. I suggest reforms, craft economic plans, and push for the end of tax systems based on work that penalize low-income individuals and benefit those who accumulate wealth from capital. My perspective comes from being raised in chaos, witnessing the harmful effects of bad policies, racial profiling, over-policing, and betrayal by institutions. However, I also carry the resilience of someone who has not given up, transforming insight into action and struggle into structure.

Whether you are a “single mother trying to understand why you are being taxed into poverty”, a young man facing police harassment for “looking suspicious,” a disillusioned veteran, or a working-class student questioning why your efforts never seem enough, you are welcome here.

The Independent Observer is not for those who benefit from the lie. It is for those who are ready to break it.

This is not commentary.
This is resistance.
This is a strategy.
This is the rebirth of the working class.

Furthermore, we will not be silenced.

The Independent Observer: A Manifesto for Dignity, Equity, and Rebirth

Prologue: We Are Not Free

Imagine living in an illusion, a carefully crafted stage show where democracy is nothing more than a marketing stunt, and absolute control lies with a privileged few. Both major parties serve the same destructive force: unchecked financial power, entrenched interests, and the social elite. They give us colorful faces and catchy slogans, yet they fail to bring real change. Our votes confirm their rigged system while our lives remain unaltered. This manifesto is not a call for chaos; it is a rallying cry for awakening. It is time to reclaim what was unjustly taken from us: our time, our equity, and our ability to think critically.

Part I: The Matrix of Labor

Modern society is a maze, not of wires and technology but of relentless work, heavy taxes, and crushing exhaustion. We are taxed every hour we are awake, drained by inflation, and stuck in the W-2 system. This setup gives us no time to think, rest, or dream. Our disposable income quickly disappears, while passive income remains out of reach. Real equity—true generational wealth—is hoarded by the wealthy few, not by accident but by design. The working class is caught in this intentionally created trap.

Part II: Symbolism and Betrayal

They distract us with symbolism rather than tackling real issues. Images of Kamala Harris waving hot sauce or Trump in a red hat divert attention from policies that impact our lives. The same elite groups fund both parties, perpetuating a cycle of betrayal. Obama bailed out Wall Street, Trump lowered taxes for billionaires, and Biden's presidency has left us with inflation—different names, same betrayal. Don't be fooled by superficial symbolism; the truth is hidden behind it. This cycle manipulates people, who are overtaxed under the W-2 system, overwhelmed by issues like police brutality, and misled by mainstream media such as CNN, FOX, BBC, and others. Today, platforms like Facebook, Twitter, Reddit, and Instagram dominate much of people's mental space, as they stay glued to their screens. Wealthy interests use this to distract and control society from harsh realities often created or intensified by social elites.

Part III: The Forgotten Power of the Middle Class

Let us remember the 1960s when Detroit was not just the Motor City but also the heart of America's working class. During that era, people had the ability for thoughtful reflection and visionary insight. They recognized injustice, participated in marches, and ignited societal change. Governor George Romney, a Republican, marched alongside civil rights leaders in 1963, advocating for fairness and equality for all, regardless of race or political view. His son, Mitt Romney, later took part in marches supporting Black Lives Matter. These actions remind us that goodness transcends political boundaries and is possible only through a middle class with the time to dream and reflect.

Part IV: Our Demands and Our Dream

We urgently call for transformative economic reform that empowers every individual. Let us eliminate unjust taxes on labor, allowing people to keep more of what they earn. We support the right to build wealth through absolute fairness, extending beyond just wages. Instead of handouts, we want asset-building programs that give us the skills to succeed. Education should focus on giving us the knowledge to create, own, and grow our assets for future generations.

Imagine a society where fathers proudly raise their sons and mothers nurture their daughters in an environment filled with dignity, free from the burdens of poverty. We envision thriving communities where crime has no place and where ownership fosters a strong sense of pride and responsibility.

Imagine a world of freedom where courage replaces fear and opportunities thrive. Together, we can create the change we want for a brighter future.

Part V: What We Stand For

We firmly reject violence and the destruction of private property. Burning cars and smashing windows will not liberate anyone; they only amplify the illusion we seek to dismantle. We endorse law, order, dignity, and nonviolent resistance. We uphold the principles of truth, constructive progress, and the undeniable right of every individual to equity, leisure, and the invaluable gift of time for reflection. The elite fear a middle class that can rest; rest is the birthplace of revolution.

Call to Action: Become an Observer of the system, then a Builder of Knowledge and Skills to strategize against the system.

If you have read this far, you are not blind. You are awakening. First, observe. Then, reflect. Unite and act. We do not need a new party; we need a new spirit—an unbreakable vow among those who believe in freedom, equity, and dignity. The time to think is now. The moment to act is near. Let this manifesto be your guiding light.

Democracy's Dead End: When Power Chooses the Wrong Man

Intro

They tell us democracy gives power to the people. They tell us that elections reflect the wisdom of the people. But what happens when democracy chooses the wrong man? Not once. Not twice. But repeatedly. What if the system isn't broken? What if it's working exactly as designed... just not for you?

The Truman Paradox: A Nobody with the Nuclear Code

Harry Truman was never meant to be President. He was a failed farmer, a clothing salesman, a man with no college degree and no scientific understanding. And yet, in 1945, he dropped the most devastating weapon in human history. Twice. Hiroshima and Nagasaki. He wasn't a military strategist. He didn't even fully understand the Manhattan Project until weeks before the bombings. He was chosen because he was politically convenient. Democracy doesn't always pick the most qualified. It often picks the most manageable.

Donald Trump: When Fame Becomes a Credential

Fast-forward to 2016. America elects Donald J. Trump — a businessman, a reality TV host, a Master of Media manipulation. He had no record of public service, no political theory, and no diplomatic experience. But he had something better: attention. In modern democracy, attention is a form of currency. The loudest voice often drowns out the wisest one. Trump didn't win because he understood the Constitution. He won because he understood the camera.

Mike Pence: The Company Man Without a Company

Now enter Mike Pence. Evangelical. Conservative. The quiet soldier of the Republican machine. When Trump needed a VP who would never challenge him, he chose Pence. But after January 6, 2021, Pence refused to overturn the election. Trump turned on him. Now he critiques Trump — from the sidelines. He's just... politically homeless. Democracy doesn't reward loyalty. It rewards dominance.

Is This Democracy—or a Popularity Game?

Let's be honest: democracy today is not ruled by the people. It's ruled by those who can sell themselves to the people. If democracy is a system of informed choice, why are most voters drowning in misinformation, working multiple jobs, and voting based on feelings? Democracy without informed citizens isn't democracy. It's a marketing campaign.

Money, Media, and Manufactured Consent

Every election costs money: ads, consultants, PACs, fake polls, and algorithmic persuasion. A 30-second ad can manipulate millions. If democracy worked as advertised, people like Bernie Sanders or Ron Paul would be frontrunners. Instead, we get billionaires, dynasties, and sellouts.

Why J.D. Vance Still Thinks Elon Musk is a Prophet

So, what about J.D. Vance? Once a voice of Appalachian struggle, now he stands by Elon Musk, a tech billionaire increasingly rejected by the political mainstream. Vance sees Musk as a symbol of power and disruption. And in politics today, that sells. He isn't learning from history. He's doubling down on the illusion.

Conclusion

So here we are... Truman dropped bombs he barely understood. Trump ruled a nation he barely studied. Pence followed the rules and got exiled. Musk played both sides and got booted. Vance still believes in the cult of genius. Democracy only works if people are educated, economically stable, and able to think critically. Maybe democracy isn't broken. Perhaps it's just been hacked.

“This is The Independent Observer. If you believe democracy can still be saved, don’t just vote. Learn. Question. Expose. And above all... think.”

The Challenge: A Civilization Searching for Direction

The West, once a shining example of creativity, progress, and faith, now seems to be struggling with its own inconsistencies. It feels like we've traded depth for comfort, our roots for a broader global perspective, and the warmth of family for fleeting pleasures. This isn't just a feeling; it's something we see happening. For instance, marriage rates in the U.S. have reached historic lows—down to six per thousand people, a sharp decline from the traditional era of the 1960s. With divorce rates near fifty percent and nearly one in three children raised in single-parent households—mainly by mothers—it's clear that what we consider home is undergoing significant change.

Today, screens and distractions often replace those sacred times, creating a culture that devalues loyalty and commitment. Economically, we also face new realities. The West depends heavily on talent from abroad to sustain its growth. Over forty percent of the workforce in Silicon Valley is from overseas, especially from vibrant cultures in India, China, and beyond. Our hospitals and universities rely on skilled professionals from Asia and Africa to operate effectively. This isn't a negative reflection on them; they're filling gaps we've unintentionally left. Still, it's disheartening to see our own young people chasing social media fame while others work tirelessly to build promising futures.

Globalism, once seen as an opportunity for unity, has often caused division. Mass immigration was promoted as cultural enrichment, yet sometimes it feels like the West sacrifices too much of its identity in the process. In Europe, native birth rates have fallen below critical levels—about 1.6 children per woman—while migrant populations continue to grow. This issue is about more than race; it's about community cohesion. A society that forgets its roots struggles to create a new story. Most troubling of all, some systems profit from our chaos. Big Tech promotes apps that treat dating as a game of chance, rewarding impulsiveness over commitment. The media often celebrates indulgence, while our schools encourage young minds to question their heritage before truly understanding it. The result? A generation searching for meaning but feeling disconnected from their own stories. Sense of frustration—not aimed at any specific group, but at a system that depends on our confusion.

The Vision: Embracing Post-Western Traditionalism

What I desire is not to tear down but to rebuild. My vision is not about exclusion or superiority; instead, it's a heartfelt push for restoration. I call this vision Post-Western Traditionalism—a movement dedicated to reclaiming the values that have historically strengthened us: family, culture, and purpose.

Family remains the foundation of a healthy society. Without strong family bonds, we're building on unstable ground. I envision a world where marriage signifies trust and commitment, not just a contract. I hope to see children flourish in homes where both parents actively engage and support them, rather than being pulled apart by negativity or distractions. Research shows this: children from intact families consistently perform better academically and emotionally. Most homeless children come from broken families, highlighting a strong link between family stability and life outcomes.

Culture is essential, too. Every community—be it Western, Eastern, or otherwise—should have the opportunity to celebrate and preserve its history and values. I'm not against sharing cultures; I refuse to apologize for cherishing my own. Whether it's the stirring verses of Homer, the architectural splendor of Europe's cathedrals, or the quiet grace of small-town churches, these are my roots, and they are worth protecting, not diminishing under the banner of "progress."

Purpose binds it all together. We've been misled into thinking that freedom means succumbing to our every whim. True freedom springs from discipline; it's about resisting short-term gratification to build something meaningful. Cultures worldwide, such as those in India and Japan, recognize the importance of duty and craftsmanship. They focus on creating significance rather than simply pursuing happiness. We can learn from this and rediscover our own sense of purpose.

This vision does not stand against anyone; it stands firmly for us. It is pro-family, pro-roots, and pro-meaning. It invites us to stop criticizing ourselves and to start building anew.

The Path Forward: Build, Don't Destroy

The current system won't change on its own; it often seems meant to keep us divided. But we are not powerless. Here's a change plan:

1. Rebuild the Family: Change starts at home. Be intentional when selecting a partner—prioritize loyalty and shared values over status. Create a supportive environment for children that highlights purpose and principles over privilege. Please provide them with a strong sense of cultural identity, as research shows this helps prevent issues like addiction and depression. If you're single, focus on becoming the person you'd want as a life partner.

2. Honor Local Culture: You don't need a major revolution to protect your heritage. Get involved in community groups, local history societies, or your local church. Treasure your traditions—whether through festivals, language, or crafts. Support policies that help native citizens while inviting newcomers. We can learn from places like Hungary, where pro-family initiatives have had a positive impact on birth rates.

3. Challenge Misinformation: Turn down the noise around you. Consider stepping away from apps that drain your time and energy (yes, including dating apps!). Read literature that has stood the test of time instead of falling for clickbait. Question narratives that depict your culture as evil or your history as shameful; recognize that the system often prefers citizens to stay uninformed and passive.

Together, let's reclaim our roots and build a brighter future that respects our past while looking ahead with hope and resolve.

THE COMMON CITIZEN COMPACT

Version 1: For Quiet Circulation and Philosophical Reprogramming PREAMBLE

We, the silent majority—those without inherited wealth, party loyalty, or elite access—declare our intent to restore liberty, opportunity, and dignity to all citizens. No left. No right. Just forward.

ARTICLE I: THE RIGHT TO EARN AND OWN

"A society that taxes your labor but not your legacy does not serve you—it serves your ruler."

- Abolish W-2 income taxation. Replace it with a net worth contribution model that focuses on passive income and asset ownership, rather than earned labor.
- Legalize labor-share cooperatives. Give workers partial equity in what they build—turn labor into wealth, not just wages.

ARTICLE II: THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY AND MOVEMENT

"Liberty must exist in both action and silence."

- Repeal Terry v. Ohio (392 U.S. 1 (1968)), Pennsylvania v. Mimms (434 U.S. 106 (1977)), and United States v. Arvizu (534 U.S. 266 (2002)).
- Restore proper Fourth Amendment protections.

ARTICLE III: POLITICAL SOVEREIGNTY THROUGH NON-AFFILIATION

"Parties divide. Liberty unites."

- Declare non-affiliation a protected political identity.
- Introduce ranked-choice and citizen rejection voting.

ARTICLE IV: LABOR REDEMPTION AND REINTEGRATION

Individuals who have served a sentence merit the opportunity to reclaim their time. Consequently, it is essential to restore complete voting and economic rights to ex-offenders. Additionally, establishing a National Reintegration Grant is recommended. Moreover, non-violent felony records should be expunged after a specified period, typically seven years.

ARTICLE V: ECONOMIC NATIONALISM WITHOUT ISOLATION

Foreign labor is cost-effective. American labor is competent.

- Invest in trade, technology, healthcare, and construction skills.
- Establish five-year tax-exempt enterprise zones.
- Provide immigration opportunities based on value-added metrics.

ARTICLE VI: INFORMATION AS A NATURAL RIGHT

A misinformed public is a manipulated public.

- Establish a Public Information Trust.
- Prohibit algorithmic suppression of political content.

ARTICLE VII: VIRAL STRATEGY FOR IDEOLOGICAL UNIFICATION

Refrain from protesting and confrontation; instead, employ infiltration as a strategic approach.

- Leverage the existing divisions within both parties.
- Maintain fluent communication with all parties involved.
- Prioritize infiltration over opposition.
- Interpret the virus metaphor literally.
- Following fragmentation on both sides, work to reconsolidate them under a common cause.

CLOSING DECLARATION

We shall refrain from rioting. We shall abstain from begging. We shall not broadcast publicly. Instead, we will replicate discreetly.

In every dialogue, lecture, video, protest, ballot, debate, classroom, co-op, and courtroom, we uphold this Compact.

We are the Ordinary Citizen.

We are the American Taught Trade Company.\furthermore, we are already present within.

THE FINAL GRIND: MANIFESTO OF A STORMWALKER

□ I did not come here to be liked.

I came to transform.

This is not just about earning a degree; it is about achieving a meaningful goal. It's about proving to myself that I can fight through anything — alone, tired, bruised, broke, disrespected — and still stand tall.

□ You will not break me.

Not with your silent judgment.

Not with your foreign tongue.

Not with your arbitrary grading or “systems.”

I see through your games.

You want to test my soul, not just my knowledge.

Good. I've endured darker shit than this.

□ I am not here to memorize facts.

I am here to build a weapon out of my mind.

Every diagram, every lecture, every all-nighter — it is a sharpening. A forging.

I will walk out of this with a blade they cannot dull.

□ I do not fear failure.

I fear regret.

I fear looking back and knowing I gave in to comfort,

When I was just one push away from the breakthrough.

□ This is war.

Moreover, I am the soldier they did not expect to survive.

So, I grind — not because the system is fair.

Not because I am motivated.

However, because I refuse to be average.

□ And even if they fail me, they cannot stop me.
I have something they will never have: a soul that will outlast institutions. A fire that no exam can extinguish.

□ On June 26...

I do not just walk into that exam.

I walk into battle.

Moreover, I will walk out forged — pass or fail — as the version of myself they never saw coming.

The Silent Stronghold

□ Independent Observer: CODE OF SILENCE: The Invisible Empire

Power is not in what you post; it is in what you hide. While others showcase themselves for attention and fame, your approach should act like a shadow—own your assets, influence from afar, and build an empire that stays untouchable. This is the 10-rule principle to remain unassailable.

□ THE 10 RULES OF SID'S SILENCE

1. Never explain your moves—only share your results. Avoid revealing every step and movement toward your goal, even to those close to you, so your vision remains clear. Humans naturally tend to envy others' achievements, and society craves wealth and power. Evidence includes the events of 2025 involving President Trump and Elon Musk; they were once close friends, but what caused the change in their relationship? However, if Elon Musk had quietly supported President Trump behind the scenes, his vision would not have caused division so quickly, and his Tesla investment would not have lost billions.
2. Own investment assets, including non-liabilities, and ensure they are legally protected from the state. There is no need to impress others around you. Remember, you are not dressing to impress others; the goal is to build discreet wealth, which equals power in society.
3. Speak only when it increases your value and is necessary in life; avoid small talk. Unnecessary attention can distract you from your true, meaningful purpose in life, preventing you from achieving significant goals.
4. Own in silence, build in shadows, collect in daylight. – method
5. Let others chase clout—you chase control.
6. If they know your income, they will calculate your downfall.
7. Avoid fame; embrace anonymity with power.
8. Use legal entities to separate your identity from your assets.
9. What they do not know about you becomes your advantage.
10. Be the one they do not see coming—and the one they cannot stop when you arrive.

□ FINAL WORD

This is not a lifestyle. This is a long game of financial warfare, geographic silence, and psychological power. Build like a ghost. Own like a king. Be forgotten—until you cannot be ignored.
